

Week 10 Idaho Legislative Update for March 14 – March 18, 2022

The tenth week of the Sixty-Sixth Idaho Legislature's Second Regular Session has been one for the history books. Record-setting transportation investments were signed into law by Governor Little, while flanked by House and Senate co-sponsors, budget co-chairs, as well as a room full of supporters. Meanwhile, even more funding worked its way through the process for transportation, education, behavioral health, and more. Heated debates on many policies continued in committees this week, and committee chairs had to stagger meeting times to accommodate longer floor sessions and other committees while trying to advance last minute victories before session wraps up.

This week also saw the first veto of session, as HB 553, relating to educators' premiums, was vetoed by Governor Little on March 16th. The bill was a special carve out for 23 school administrators. While this bill passed both the House and Senate with a wide margin of support, the governor believed it created a double dip for a select group of administrators and conflicted with the career ladder and CEC pay increases. This serves as a friendly reminder that even a well-supported piece of legislation must pass final muster with the Governor.

With the first veto of session in the books and many bills already signed into law, the House has begun the all-too-familiar process of holding certain bills hostage with the hope of having their priorities heard. In addition to this familiar antic, a select few contrarians in the House continue to object to the waving of bills being read. This costs the State time and money and creates consternation among House members as it drastically slows down the process in the waning days of the session. While this practice is burdensome to all, the person who suffers the most is the House Clerk, who is forced to read each word of bills across the House floor - she certainly does not suffer from bibliophobia as these tactics continue. The other frustration is those same contrarians repeatedly try to call up personal bills as political theater. The House responds in lightning fashion to stop them, but the process is repeated multiple times a day and only further delays the people's work and annoys the rest of the members on the floor.

Despite the antics of the few, the House has worked quickly through many of its budgets and policies, even the often-controversial higher education budget got through the House on the first try this year. The Senate continues to work diligently but slowly, hearing bills, passing appropriations, and considering appointments by the Governor. Even though the Senate calendar is lengthy, Leadership has been taking every opportunity to expedite the process, including rolling the vote count from previously passed bills on less controversial bills. The Senate is also tasked with amending many bills this session as House Leadership has been unwilling to use the amending order this year, thus making the Senate's responsibilities even greater and their schedule even longer.

While JFAC has finished its formal budget setting, they met this week to add $100 Million more to the Transportation Expansion and Congestion Mitigation (TECM) Fund to help offset the bonding payments the State would use to expand and update roads. JFAC is planning to meet again early next week to appropriate remaining funds for bills passed this week, a process known as "trailer appropriations" - another good signal that the final days of session are here. In addition to trailer bills, JFAC will also be redoing the Department of Commerce appropriation that was struck down by the House late last week.

With $100 million in ARPA funding for broadband infrastructure in flux, amendments to HB 735 that intend to create tens of millions in property tax relief, and the Governor's literacy bill being redrafted without him, the last days of session are sure to be dramatic. The work continues until they formally adjourn for the year. We believe next week will be the last week of session. But until then, we are working hard and watching closely, but not done.
